The Court of Justice of the European Union and Fixed-term Work Putting a Brake on Labour Market Dualization?

de la Porte, Caroline; Emmenegger, Patrick

Document Version

Accepted author manuscript

Published in:

Journal of European Social Policy

DOI:

10.1177/0958928716684316

Publication date:

2017

License

Unspecified

Citation for published version (APA):

de la Porte, C., & Emmenegger, P. (2017). The Court of Justice of the European Union and Fixed-term Work: Putting a Brake on Labour Market Dualization? Journal of European Social Policy, 27(3), 295-310.
<https://doi.org/10.1177/0958928716684316>

Link to publication in CBS Research Portal

General rights

Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the public portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us (research.lib@cbs.dk) providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Download date: 26. Apr. 2023

The Court of Justice of the European Union and Fixed-term Work: Putting a Brake on Labour Market Dualization?

Caroline de la Porte and Patrick Emmenegger

Journal article (Accepted manuscript)

CITE: The Court of Justice of the European Union and Fixed-term Work : Putting a Brake on Labour Market Dualization? / de la Porte, Caroline; Emmenegger, Patrick. In: Journal of European Social Policy, Vol. 27, No. 3, 2017, p. 295-310.

Copyright © The Author(s) 2017. Reprinted by permission of SAGE Publications.

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1177/0958928716684316>

Uploaded to CBS Research Portal: January 2019

The Court of Justice of the European Union and Fixed-term Work: Putting a Brake on Labour Market Dualisation?

Caroline de la Porte and Patrick Emmenegger

This is the pre-proofed version of our paper that has been published as aop

Under this link

<http://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1177/0958928716684316>

Abstract

While fixed-term work benefits employers and increases the prospects of employability of various categories of workers, it is inherently precarious. The EU directive on fixed-term work emphasizes the importance of equal treatment of workers on fixed-term contracts with comparable permanent workers and aims to prevent abuse of this contract form. Surprisingly, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) rulings in this area have by and large been neglected in comparative labour market research. We fill this gap by systematically analysing the CJEU case law concerning fixed-term work and connecting it to the literatures on labour market dualisation and Europeanisation of labour law. We develop an analytical framework to analyse the Europeanisation of labour law, which we then use to analyse the directive and the case law regarding the directive on fixed-term work. Our findings show that the equal treatment is affirmed in all cases under analysis for different provisions of labour contracts. With regard to abuse of recourse to fixed-term contracts, by contrast, the rulings still represent a zone of legal uncertainty, whereby some judgements allow for fixed-term contracts, such as for social policy purposes, while others prohibit their use. We therefore conclude that the CJEU does not put a brake on the politics of dualisation, but it does insist on equal treatment of workers, regardless of their contractual arrangements.

Introduction

Nonstandard employment has moved centre stage in comparative labour market research in recent years (King and Rueda 2008; Palier and Thelen 2010; Emmenegger et al. 2012). The growth of nonstandard forms of employment has led to the development of two-tier labour markets, entailing an increasingly clear-cut split between a group of well-protected labour market insiders and more precarious labour market outsiders. Outsiders are often not external to the labour market as such, but they have atypical contracts – covering part-time, temporary agency and fixed-term workers – rather than open-ended and full-time ones. Workers in such non-standard employment typically lack adequate social insurance cover and are more vulnerable regarding access to human resource development, wage increases, and transition to open-ended contracts.

The European Union (EU) has encouraged the increase of employment rates, notably through “flexicurity”, comprising labour market deregulation, together with comprehensive training and reasonable unemployment benefits to allow smooth re-entry into the labour market. However, the result of this has been mixed: many countries have flexibilised labour markets, but also increased requirements for accessing unemployment benefits and shortened periods of receipt of unemployment benefit (de la Porte and Jacobsson 2012). European countries, particularly those with rigid labour markets, have attempted to increase labour supply, facilitated by flexibilisation strategies and the use of atypical contracts (King and Rueda 2008; Eichhorst and Marx 2012).

This increased use of atypical contracts is the result of various factors, not least government policies to increase employment rates by means of labour market deregulation. Atypical work has also been useful to facilitate a shift into the labour market for the unemployed, and has received support among employers (Eichhorst 2014). Governments have seen atypical work – particularly fixed-term work – as a possible stepping stone to an open-ended contract. However, this belief should be treated with caution. Eichhorst (2014) argued that “the potential as a stepping stone to permanent employment is undercut if there is a strong degree of segmentation in labour markets”. High segmentation is typical of labour markets with strong corporatist roots in welfare state arrangements (Palier and Thelen 2010; Emmenegger et al. 2012).

While most research on the dualisation of European labour markets focuses on the national level, the impact of EU activity is often excluded. This is surprising, since the EU has agreed on three directives to regulate atypical contracts.¹ Countouris (2007) has coined the adoption of these directives as an attempt at achieving the “re-regulation” of labour law. At the same time, they serve a labour market flexibility aim by codifying the use of atypical work. So far, research has not focused on the role of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) in interpreting these directives. We focus on the directive on fixed-term work (FTWD), which is characterised by tensions between common EU norms and national political priorities, and between representatives of labour and business. Furthermore, fixed-term work is precarious with regard to dismissal protection and other labour rights, such as access to training and career development. Not surprisingly, by far most litigations and controversies have taken place regarding the directive on atypical work. We are not analysing the conflictual political context leading up to the framework agreement on fixed-term contracts (Countouris 2007) or the timeliness of transposition of directives, on which a vast amount of research and knowledge already exists (Falkner et al. 2005; Falkner and Treib 2008; Treib 2014).

¹ These are the directives on part-time work (OJEC 1997), fixed-term work (OJEC 1999), and temporary agency work (OJEC 2008).

We examine the Europeanisation of fixed-term work by scrutinising the role of the CJEU as an agent in interpreting EU law in this area. A comprehensive analysis of the CJEU case law in the area of fixed-term work contextualises the role of the EU in the process of labour market reform in Member States; it thereby underscores which principles are upheld by the CJEU in an area at the crossroads between employers' desire for labour market flexibility and workers' need for job security.

The FTWD is based on a framework agreement between social partners², and in essence represents a political compromise among governments and among social partners (Countouris 2007; Clauwaert 1999). It endeavours to achieve equal treatment of all workers, irrespective of the type of contract they have, and requires that Member States adopt legislation to prevent the abuse of fixed-term contracts. The FTWD is designed with some flexibility; for example, the codification of "open-ended contract" and "prevention of abuse of fixed-term contracts" can be defined in accordance with the different labour law and collective bargaining traditions that prevail across the EU. Because of this, the FTWD can be regarded as an "incomplete contract", a notion that captures openness and ambiguity of legal and political agreements, allowing for actors to interpret such agreements in different ways. Typically, this notion is associated with a rational scholarly perspective, allowing for actors to pursue their own agenda and thereby to increase their own power and legitimacy in a decision-making process (Pollack 2003). For our purpose, ambiguity may lead to various different (national) interpretations of the FTWD, after which the CJEU, as the delegated agent, should clarify the ambiguity surrounding key principles in the directive.

Our analysis of case law shows that where the CJEU has a strong legal base, such as anti-discrimination, the rulings are clear and aim to improve protection and conditions for fixed-term workers. By contrast, in more contentious areas of fixed-term work, such as age discrimination or the conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts, the CJEU rules restrictively in most cases. In other areas, such as the abuse of fixed-term work, the rulings of the Court are ambiguous and thus continue to represent legal zones of uncertainty. Therefore, we conclude that the CJEU's rulings do not stop the use of fixed-term contracts, but improve the conditions for workers on fixed-term contracts, insisting on their equal treatment with workers on open-ended contracts.

² European Trade Union Confederation representing workers' side and BUSINESSEUROPE (then called Union des Industries de la Communauté européenne), the European Centre of Employers and Enterprises providing Public Services and the European Association of Craft, Small and Medium-sized Enterprises on the employers' side.

The remainder of this paper is organised as follows. The first section reviews the literature on the CJEU, particularly with regard to its role in labour market regulation. The second section introduces our research questions and analytical framework. The third section presents the results of our analysis of the FTWD, and the fourth section presents the results of the analysis of the CJEU judgments. A final section concludes about the principles upheld by the CJEU in the area of fixed-term work, focusing on how the tension between labour market regulation and worker protection plays out in the case law analysed in this paper.

CJEU activity at the crossroads of labour market deregulation and worker protection?

The CJEU plays a central role in Europeanisation processes by interpreting EU law in cases of uncertainty (Leibfried 2010; Davies 2012b). The CJEU interprets EU legislation in case of lack of clarity of some clauses via preliminary rulings; that is, judgements that arise from prejudicial questions from national courts to the CJEU.³ There is a vast literature concerned with the judicialisation of politics at the EU level, whereby the CJEU rulings have political implications for the EU and its Member States (Stone Sweet 2010; Wasserfallen 2010; Martinsen 2015). There is also an emerging literature on the impact of EU law in Member States, ranging from expansive (Alter 1998; Blauberger 2012) to “contained justice” (Conant 2002). The literature shows that the CJEU is most influential as an agent when fit is high and when resistance to the principles in rulings is low (Börzel and Risse 2000; Panke 2007). Other scholars highlight the role of domestic politics as important explanations for Europeanisation (Mastenbroeck and Kaeding 2006).

Scharpf (2010) has shown that the CJEU has strongly defended – and even extended – the principles of the Single Market. As a result, Scharpf (2010: 211) argues, the CJEU has “a liberalizing and deregulatory impact on the socio-economic regimes of European Union member states”. Bell (2012), meanwhile, has documented the CJEU's expansive interpretation of anti-discrimination. In line with the latter, Howard (2011) and Mazey (2012) have shown how EU equality law – and therefore the legal base on which the CJEU can rely in case of dispute – has been strengthened during the last two decades. While all the advances are important, there are two in particular that are worth highlighting for this paper: the coming into force of the Treaty of Lisbon that codifies the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights as EU law, and the development of the principle of non-discrimination as a general and fundamental principle of EU law. Mazey (2012) argued that Europeanisation is greatest where the EU has specific legal competence, such as in anti-discrimination policy, with regard to employment-related issues. Little is known about the CJEU's role for areas that include both labour market liberalisation and worker protection, such as the regulation of atypical work.

³ In addition, the Commission ensures that the directives are fully implemented in the Member States and can launch infringement procedures if they are not implemented accordingly.

The CJEU's task concerning regulation of atypical work is complex, due to the multi-level structure of labour market regulation (including the derogation from national regulations by means of plant-level collective bargaining), to the proliferation of new contractual forms (that make it increasingly difficult to pin down the definition of employment relationships and labour contracts), and to the ambiguous formulation of the directives (Countouris 2007; Hepple and Veneziani 2009; Emmenegger 2014). The FTWD, in particular, though based on a framework agreement concluded between the European social partners, was the outcome of a protracted political process that ended in compromise, to respect Member States' aim of increasing labour supply via fixed-term work while seeking to ensure decent working conditions for workers (Countouris 2007). Subsequently, there has been an unusually high number of preliminary rulings in the light of this directive (Bell 2011).⁴

That there have been more cases of litigation concerning fixed-term work than in relation to other atypical forms may be due to the qualitative difference between fixed-term and part-time work. Part-time work, particularly when voluntary, can facilitate the combination of family and working life, though problems exist with regard to gender-segregated labour markets and glass ceilings with respect to women's possibilities for career development compared to men (Datta Gupta et al. 2008; Esping-Andersen 2009). However, despite these drawbacks, part-time work does provide social security coverage – albeit with pensions that are relative to contributions –, and it can therefore represent a stable form of employment, and one that allows for career development. It is true that in low-wage Southern European countries part-time work is mainly involuntary, but it is not as widespread in these countries as in parts of Northern and Western Europe (Falkner et al. 2005: 163). Fixed-term work, by contrast, is a highly contentious issue throughout Europe, and the role of the EU level in this area deserves thorough analysis.

⁴ For the Fixed-Term Work Directive (FTWD), the Commission has only started one infringement procedure against Luxembourg (case C-238/14) through "reasoned opinion", after which the legislation was rectified. Therefore, we choose not to focus on this in our analysis, which instead focuses on the preliminary rulings.

Case selection, data, and analytical framework

Due to the in-built tensions around the issue of fixed-term work, this paper carries out a systematic analysis of the case law on the FTWD (from 2007 to 2013) to gauge which principles are most strongly and consistently upheld by the CJEU. At the time of writing, there have been 60 cases relating to the FTWD. The data collection strategy consisted of seeking out, in the database of EU case law, cases that met the following criteria: 1) case brought before the CJEU alone (that is, not the general court or civil service tribunal); 2) reference to directive 1999/70; and 3) reference to this directive in the “grounds of judgement” and the “operative part” of a case (that is, not merely in an “opinion”). This strategy ensured identification of those cases in which the FTWD was the principal focus of the litigation.⁵ For the 60 cases of applications to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling in relation to the FTWD, a preliminary analysis of all cases revealed that 17 of them led to judgements in which fixed-term work was the central issue (the main grounds for the litigation), and not a merely marginal aspect. These are the cases that will be analysed in greater depth in this paper.

The literature suggests that EU legislation has different potential for Europeanisation (Radaelli 2000). With regard to the CJEU, the scholarship shows that, as an agent, this institution can generate either a more restrictive or a more expansive interpretation of EU legislation (Bell 2011; Blauberger 2012). Our study will add to this literature. Furthermore, it will discuss the findings in relation to developments in Member States to highlight the European level of activity, and thereby break with strong traditions of methodological nationalism in comparative labour market research. Our research questions are as follows:

- (1) What is the potential of the directive itself for Europeanisation (restrictive, neutral, or expansive)?
- (2) How does the CJEU interpret the core principles of the directive (restrictively, neutrally, or expansively)? And related to this, what scope for interpretation is left to the national judges (wide, implicit, or narrow)?
- (3) What is the degree of Europeanisation of the EU activity in the area of fixed-term work?

Building on the work of Blauberger (2012) and Davies (2012b), the analytical framework displayed in Figure 1 below summarises the interaction between the different dimensions of Europeanisation and the resulting degree of Europeanisation (outcome).

⁵ URL: <http://curia.europa.eu> (accessed in January 2016).

Figure 1 about here

The first dimension we analyse is the content of the EU directive itself, where the Europeanisation potential of the directive ranges on a continuum from restrictive (associated with less Europeanisation) to expansive scope (associated with more Europeanisation). This dimension is important because the directive provides the legal framework on which the CJEU can rely in its responses to preliminary rulings. Intervening factors (the development of EU law as well as national labour law and employment policy) contextualise the Europeanisation of the EU directive. In our analysis, we will discuss these intervening factors. However, we are not making claims of direct causal linkages between the intervening variables and the Europeanisation of the directive.

The second dimension is the CJEU interpretation of the EU law that can also range from restrictive to expansive along the continuum of less to more Europeanisation. Linked to this, the third dimension is the discretion left to national judges by the CJEU, which ranges from high (with higher likelihood of respecting national traditions and circumstances) to low (with more likelihood of impact of CJEU ruling). These two dimensions will be analysed together in one sub-section on the case law on the FTWD. Finally, all three dimensions together determine the level of Europeanisation, which can range from contained (to a particular judgement and without broader repercussions) to more expansive justice.

There are also other factors that influence processes of dualisation. For instance, the literature argues that the crisis context, which characterises the period under investigation, has further strengthened a policy focus on increasing labour supply (Bermeo and Pontusson 2012; Farnsworth and Irving 2011). Palier and Thelen (2010: 133) have stated that, especially for countries with a corporatist-conservative welfare state, the use of fixed-term contracts represents the “typical continental answer to the new economic context”. Increasing the labour supply by means of atypical work has been on the political agenda for the period in question (2007–2013) in corporatist-conservative welfare states (Palier and Thelen 2010; Eichhorst and Marx 2012; Emmenegger et al. 2012). Fixed-term work has proved to be a useful stepping stone from unemployment into employment, but the transition from a fixed-term contract to an open-ended contract does not often materialise (Eichhorst 2014).

Although the case law by itself is unlikely to halt the use of fixed-term contracts, which as stressed above depends on a variety of factors, the examination of CJEU decisions provides important insights as to whether the case law could help to diminish the use of fixed-term contracts and/or improve conditions for fixed-term workers. Thus, this analysis on the Europeanisation of labour law breaks with methodological nationalism, which characterises the bulk of literature on comparative labour market policy.

Europeanisation and the FTWD: restrictive scope

The aim of the FTWD was not to generalise the use of fixed-term work. The preamble states that “contracts of an indefinite duration are, and will continue to be, the general form of employment relationship between employers and workers” (OJEC, 1999: clause 6). Yet, governments have sought to use fixed-term contracts to increase labour markets’ flexibility. In addition, governments may find appeal in the “stepping stone theory”, which argues that a fixed-term contract may be a step towards an open-ended contract (Davies 2012a). Whatever the governments’ motives to promote the use of fixed-term contracts, the generalisation of fixed-term contracts in corporatist-conservative welfare states has contributed to increasing labour market participation (Venn 2009; Palier and Thelen 2010; Emmenegger 2014). Thus, the directive was agreed due to the increasing use of fixed-term contracts in the topography of European labour markets: “fixed-term employment contracts respond, in certain circumstances, to the needs of both employers and workers” (general considerations, FTWD). Hence, the purpose of the FTWD is not to reverse this trend; nor is the aim to provide comprehensive coverage for fixed-term workers, but rather, “[t]his agreement sets out the general principles and minimum requirements relating to fixed-term work, recognising that their detailed application needs to take account of the realities of specific national, sectoral and seasonal situations” (OJEC, 1999, emphasis added). Table 1 below presents key aspects of the directive, which will be discussed below.

Table 1 about here

The first purpose of the FTWD is to ensure protection and equal treatment for a fixed-term worker with a “comparable permanent worker” (CPW) or relevant collective agreements (see clause 3). For the area of part-time work, this model has been labelled the “onion skin model” (Falkner et al. 2005), indicating that a slimmer working week should have all the same components (protection, insurance, training, wages, bonuses etc.) as a full working week. For fixed-term work, the principle of anti-discrimination (with regard to comparable workers on open-ended contracts; see clause 4) implies equal payment, equal access to training, and the prospect of obtaining an open-ended contract if the employment relationship continues beyond the previously agreed, fixed period of time.

However, differential treatment may be justified on “objective” grounds, which, as noted by Bell (2011) is striking since any justification of direct discrimination under EU law is normally ruled out by the anti-discrimination legislation. Furthermore, while a comparator makes sense in the context of labour law, the hinging of equal treatment entirely on the comparator, while allowing for identification of and ruling against direct discrimination, actually prevents a more comprehensive definition of anti-discrimination (Bell 2011: 164). Since EU anti-discrimination law has been strengthened over the last decades (Mazey 2012; Howard 2011), it is surprising that the FTWD is more limited in this respect. Indeed, the anti-discrimination aspects of the directive are relative (to a comparable permanent worker) and could allow discrimination under objective conditions. On this basis, we conclude that the directive embodies a restrictive interpretation of anti-discrimination compared to other EU legislation in this area.

The second purpose of the directive is to prevent the use of successive fixed-term contracts or relationships (OJEC, 1999: clause 1). While requiring Member States to ensure that there are rules, the FTWD, in order to take account also of the different regulatory frameworks in Member States, allows for different paths to prevent the successive use of fixed-term contracts (OJEC, 1999: clause 5). While at first this may seem to be a weakness, it caters for the possibility of the directive being implemented in all EU Member States. Indeed, the aim is not for it to be a one-size-fits-all solution, but rather, to enable all EU Member States to adopt the principles agreed in the directive in order to ensure equal treatment of workers and to prevent successive use of fixed-term contracts. However, it can indeed also be seen as a weakness, since the conditions under which the employment relationship is to be deemed permanent must be defined in national legislation, and the conditions for identifying contracts as “successive” must also be defined nationally and, importantly, with the involvement of social partners. Clause 5, on prevention of abuse, as well as clauses 6 and 7 (OJEC, 1999), on information of vacancies and access to training, should be seen in the light of aiming to facilitate a transition of fixed-term to open-ended contracts. This would be in line with stepping stone theory (Davies 2012a). This objective is open to interpretation, and is therefore rather restrictive in terms of its potential for re-regulation regarding the use of fixed-term contracts.

Thus, our analysis of the content of the directive on fixed-term work suggests that while it does have potential for Europeanisation with respect to anti-discrimination, recourse to fixed-term work, and conversion of fixed-term contracts into open-ended contracts, a number of loopholes in its formulation means that as a legal base, the directive is rather weak. This contrasts with the extensive legal base in anti-discrimination that has become a fundamental principle in EU labour law.

Europeanisation of CJEU judgements on the FTWD?

An analysis of CJEU judgements concerned with the FTWD produces numerous striking findings. Among the 60 cases of application to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling on a matter arising from the FTWD, our analysis served to identify 17 cases of judgements where fixed-term work was the central issue (the main grounds for the litigation) and not a merely marginal one. Table A1 in the online annex provides an overview of the 17 cases analysed, with a breakdown based on main issues and indicating whether cases emanated from the public or private sectors, the position of the government, the outcome of the case, and whether or not discretion was accorded to the national court.

There are two interesting observations to be made. Firstly, the large majority of these cases (15 out of 17) come from continental and in particular Southern European countries with corporatist-conservative welfare states (Germany, Spain, Italy, Greece, Austria, and France) where social rights are derived from labour market participation. These countries have traditionally had very rigid labour markets. The governments have resorted to increasing numbers of fixed-term contracts in order to increase labour market participation, resulting in a dualised labour market of protected insiders with higher wages and less protected outsiders with lower wages (King and Rueda 2008; Palier and Thelen 2010; Emmenegger 2014). However, it should be noted that recently, following the 2008 financial crisis, governments have also undertaken several reforms to make it easier to dismiss workers on open-ended contracts (Schömann 2014).

Secondly, most cases emanated from fixed-term contracts in the public rather than the private sector.⁶ While not statistically significant in any way, this is an indication that labour market dualisation is, as shown in recent literature, just as relevant for the public sector as for the private sector (Kroos and Gottschall 2012). An additional element of explanation here may be that workers in the public sector – where union density levels are higher – are more likely to challenge issues arising from their employment contract or working conditions.

In the following sections, we analyse the CJEU decisions according to key clauses of the FTWD. We provide an in-depth analysis of the principal cases that set a precedent, as well as a complementary analysis of subsequent cases on the same issue. We thus present, in succession, analyses of cases addressing anti-discrimination, age discrimination, abuse of fixed-term contracts, and conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts.

⁶ In several countries, employment contracts of public sector workers are considered to be part of administrative law rather than labour law. However, for the sake of simplicity, we use labour law to refer to both private and public sector employment contracts.

Anti-discrimination: expansive CJEU interpretation with narrow discretion for national judges

The issue of anti-discrimination has been discussed in the literature as the key aspect of the FTWD. Clause 4 of the FTWD stipulates that “fixed-term workers shall not be treated in a less favourable manner than comparable permanent workers solely because they have a fixed-term contract or relation unless difference is justified on objective grounds”. The equal treatment principle is the key aspect on which this clause hinges, but the clause is minimalist (prohibiting direct discrimination) and not comprehensive. Comprehensive anti-discrimination measures would prohibit direct, indirect and other forms of discrimination, as is the case in the directive on anti-discrimination (Bell 2011, 2012) and in the wider development of anti-discrimination as a fundamental principle in EU law (Mazey 2012; Howard 2011). Thus, the starting point in the FTWD is rather modest.

The case that has set a precedent in this area is Case C-307/05 Yolanda Del Cerro Alonso v Osakidetza-Servicio Vasco de Salud [2007], in which the main issue addressed was whether the FTWD covers financial terms of employment other than pay (such as bonuses). Under Spanish legislation, special rules were applicable to health care workers entailing a distinction between staff on open-ended contracts and those subject to fixed-term contracts. This discriminated against fixed-term workers in terms of entitlement to the special “three yearly allowances”. Del Cerro Alonso had 12 years of service (1992 to 2004) in the health care sector on the basis of fixed-term contracts; she was then granted an open-ended contract, at which point she claimed in-service benefits retroactively and was met with a refusal. The local San Sebastian court to which she took her case put two questions to the CJEU. Firstly, does the FTWD also cover financial conditions (other than pay)? Secondly, if this is the case, can the special legislation for civil servants⁷ be overruled?

The position of the Spanish government was that this worker’s terms of employment did not include extra financial bonuses. However, the CJEU ruled that there was no objective reason why workers on open-ended contracts should be entitled to the bonus if workers on fixed-term contracts were denied it. Furthermore, the CJEU noted that equal treatment is a principle of Community social law, which “cannot be interpreted restrictively” and that equality of treatment is a “general principle of EC law". Thus, as pointed out by Bell (2011: 160), "the Court is elevating the status of the Directive (or at least its equal treatment provisions) in the direction of a fundamental right". In this case, although the directive contains a relative interpretation of equal treatment (with a comparator), the CJEU has an expansive interpretation of equal treatment. The Court's judgement was that fixed-term workers should not be discriminated against with regard to bonuses, so that the notion of "employment conditions" should include access to extra bonuses. Thus, the national legislation for civil servants in this area was overruled and the Spanish legislation was rectified to prohibit discrimination. However, this re-regulation was minimal and restricted to this area, since other aspects of fixed-term work remained untouched.

⁷ Here and in the following, “civil servants” refers to public sector workers.

By contrast, major labour reforms did take place in Spain in the context of the financial crisis, as a result of which the gap between workers on fixed-term and those on open-ended contracts has been narrowed from an anti-discrimination standpoint. The reforms of 2010 and 2012 increased the flexibility applicable to workers on open-ended contracts, particularly with regard to dismissals. However, no changes were introduced for workers on fixed-term contracts, despite demands by unions for improvement of their conditions (and for incentives to reduce this type of contract). In conditions of economic uncertainty, the use of fixed-term contracts in the Spanish labour market is deemed too important to change its status (Gomez Abelleira 2012; Mercader Uguina 2012).

The Del Cerro Alonso case served to enshrine an expansive interpretation of equal treatment in the CJEU case law on fixed-term work. In subsequent anti-discrimination cases, the CJEU also had an expansive interpretation of the principle, in keeping with its strong legal anchor in this area. In Case C-486/08 Zentralbetriebsrat der Landeskrankenhäuser Tirols v Land Tirol [2010], the plaintiff argued that a fixed-term contract of six months should not exclude access to benefits and leave in comparison with a comparable permanent worker (CPW) in transition to a part-time contract. In the Joined Cases C-444/09 and C-456/09 Rosa María Gavieiro Gavieiro (C-444/09), Ana María Iglesias Torres (C-456/09) v. Consellería de Educación e Ordenación Universitaria de la Xunta de Galicia [2010], the issue raised concerned access to a special benefit (length-of-service increment) for temporary civil servants who, under the legislation for civil servants, had been excluded from such a benefit exclusively due to their status as fixed-term workers. In the Irish case C-268/06 Impact v Minister for Agriculture and Food, Minister for Arts, Sport and Tourism, Minister for Communications, Marine and Natural Resources, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform, Minister for Transport [2008], where temporary civil servants were claiming the same pay and pensions as CPWs, the CJEU ruled unambiguously that the Irish government (employer) must grant equal treatment. In all three of these cases, the CJEU ruled that equality of treatment must prevail with regard to all aspects of the employment contract, leaving no discretion to national judges. Accordingly, the case law in this area altered the national collective agreements or national labour law.

In line with the Del Cerro Alonso ruling, in these three cases the CJEU ruled that temporary civil servants can invoke the directive in order to obtain the types of benefit in question and that national legislation should be rectified accordingly. In all these cases, we see a clear trend whereby the CJEU uses the notion of CPW to require equality of treatment, irrespective of status, between workers undertaking the same task. This is an expansive interpretation of equal treatment, despite the use of a comparator, because explicit reference is made to the general principle of equal treatment in Community social law. The Member States were required to change their legislation and rules, often stripping civil servants of special status (sometimes requiring a dismantling of special civil servant legislation) and enabling fixed-term workers to have the same rights as civil servants.

Age discrimination: anti-discrimination, but on fixed-term contracts

Two cases – Case C-144/04 Werner Mangold v Rüdiger Helm [2005] ECJ and Case C-109/09 Deutsche Lufthansa AG v Gertraud Kumpan [2011] ECJ – concerned age discrimination (use of fixed-term contracts) against workers under the legal retirement age, but who were regarded as “older workers”. In these cases the CJEU dampened the possibilities for (ab)use of fixed-term contracts; yet, there was no clear prohibition, indicating that the rulings reflected a very restrictive reading of the directive’s clauses relating to abuse of the fixed-term contract. These rulings do not embody the possibility to prevent labour market dualisation in relation to older workers below retirement age.⁸

In Germany, where both these cases originated, the 1996 regulation on increasing labour supply, subsequently extended in 2000 and 2002, permitted employment on fixed-term contract on no objective grounds other than age (Emmenegger 2014: 238–239). In 2002, the age threshold as an “objective” reason for the use of fixed-term contracts had been lowered from 58 to 52 years. It was this legislation that was challenged in the Mangold case. Mr Mangold, a lawyer aged 56, was hired by Mr Helm on a fixed-term basis for the very purpose of challenging the law in the courts (Stone Sweet and Stranz 2012: 100-101), the argument being that the German 2000 Act on part-time and fixed-term work and its 2002 revision were in breach of the 1999 fixed-term work and the 2000 anti-discrimination directives. The Munich labour court referred several questions to the CJEU, in particular whether subjecting employees aged 52 to fixed-term contract on sole grounds of age was compatible with Community law (Schmidt 2005: 505).

⁸ The Joined Cases – C-250/09 and C-268/09 Vasil Ivanov Georgiev v Tehnicheski universitet – Sofia, filial Plovdiv [2010] ECJ – concerned the use of fixed-term contracts for workers above the legal retirement age. In this case, there was no prohibition, but there were no risks with regard to labour market dualisation. Though this case will not be discussed here in detail, its key aspects and those of the judgement are given in Table A1 in the online annex.

The German government's position was that this provision was intended to encourage employment of older persons in Germany. In November 2005, the CJEU ruled that there should be no differential treatment between workers on fixed-term and those on open-ended contracts. The CJEU also ruled that in relying solely on the "age" criterion, German labour law was in breach of Community law in the area of anti-discrimination (Schmidt 2005: 515). Therefore, this represented an expansive interpretation of anti-discrimination. However, considerable discretion was left to the national judge to examine the particular situation. The consequence of the judgement was that the national legislation on fixed-term contracts for workers aged 52 or older had to be altered, and an adjustment was made whereby the maximum duration of fixed-term contracts for such workers was to be restricted to five years maximum; additionally, recourse to these contracts became limited to workers who had been unemployed for at least four months immediately before taking up the new job (Stettes 2005). Thus, using fixed-term work as a stepping stone for older workers to enter employment was maintained. The EU compatible re-regulation by Germany was minimal.

In the second case on age discrimination (Kumpan), the dispute centred on a collective agreement for airline workers. According to the collective agreement concerned, an open-ended contract would end automatically when a worker reached the age of 55. Thereafter, the collective agreement allowed for fixed-term contracts with such workers by mutual agreement and insofar as the worker in question was considered to be 'physically and occupationally fit', up to the age of 60. After Miss Kumpan was 55, her contract was renewed annually until she was 60, and she claimed that this represented an abuse of recourse to fixed-term contracts on the exclusive grounds of age. Here, the ruling of the CJEU was in the footsteps of the Mangold case. Firstly, the CJEU ruled that discrimination should not be allowed when the initial employment relationship continued for the same activity, with the same employer. Secondly, the successive use of fixed-term contracts from age 55 to 60 should not be allowed; that is, the collective agreement should be altered to ensure that there was no automatic recourse to fixed-term contracts after 55. There was little room for discretion to the national judge. The CJEU rulings do, in this way, prevent the existence of legislation that discriminates exclusively on the basis of age.

In sum, in relation to age discrimination, the CJEU softens the use of fixed-term contracts under the age of 65, but does not generally prohibit their use for this age group. The rather weak nature of the ruling in general and compared to the stronger EU anti-discrimination law in the workplace (prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination; see Hartlapp 2012) is compounded by the fact that Member States adapt only minimally to its requirements.

Preventing the abuse of fixed-term contracts: mixed evidence of CJEU activity

Seven of the cases concerned prevention of the abuse of fixed-term contracts; in all cases, the CJEU adopted a rather restrictive interpretation. In the Kumpan case, the CJEU argued that it was difficult to determine conditions under which the use of fixed-term contracts actually constituted abuse. For this question, significant wide indirect discretion was left to the national judge to determine these “conditions”, suggesting that the CJEU does not wish to interfere in Germany’s policy of using fixed-term work for “older workers” below the statutory retirement age. It also reflects the weak legal base of the directive itself in this area, since “conditions for abuse” is explicitly mentioned as having to be determined in Member States.

In another German case – Case C-586/10 Bianca Küçük v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [2012] ECJ –, the plaintiff had been employed, in the context of a social policy aim (parental leave), on a succession of 13 fixed-term contracts over a period of 11 years. In this case, the CJEU ruled that the recurrence of temporary contracts, even on a permanent basis, is not necessarily indicative of the absence of objective reasons for such a practice, particularly if the practice is in the service of another social policy aim. However, the CJEU then complemented this observation with an indication that the number and cumulative duration of fixed-term contracts with the same employer should be analysed by the national judge, thereby leaving broad discretion to the latter. The CJEU’s stance here is quite weak.

In another case in Ireland, Impact, where civil servants claimed that their (renewed) fixed-term contracts were of unreasonably long duration (eight years), the CJEU maintained that there were no objective reasons for this long duration on a fixed-term contract. This constituted a case of gross abuse, where the CJEU ruled expansively, but in line with the aims of the directive.

A case that stands apart from the rest is the Zentralbetriebsrat der Landeskrankenhäuser Tirols case. Where workers were hired on the basis of fixed-term contracts, the CJEU ruled that they should be accorded equal treatment and that the form of contract was illegal, the implication being that open-ended contracts should have been used instead. The government of the Austrian state Tyrol argued that fixed-term contracts were used for administrative reasons, but the CJEU ruled that the reasons were clearly budgetary and that the discrimination was therefore unjustified. Bell (2012) commented that prior to this ruling, it was not clear whether financial reasons could be invoked as “objective justification” for fixed-term work; this case suggests that they cannot. Given the current financial recession, the lack of a possibility to justify the use of fixed-term contracts on grounds of budgetary constraint could have considerable repercussions. Here, the CJEU adopted an expansive interpretation and the national court was left with little discretion.

There have been numerous cases concerning the abuse of fixed-term contracts in which plaintiffs had only one fixed-term contract (or one renewal of a fixed-term contract), a circumstance which invalidated the claim of (unreasonable or successive) abuse of fixed-term contracts (Mangold, Case C-180/04 Andrea Vassallo v Azienda Ospedaliera Ospedale San Martino di Genova e Cliniche Universitarie Convenzionate [2006], Case C-53/04 Cristiano Marrosu, Gianluca Sardino v Azienda Ospedaliera Ospedale San Martino di Genova e Cliniche Universitarie [2006] and Joined Cases C-378/07 to C-380/07 Kiriaki Angelidaki and Others (C-378/07) v Organismos Nomarkhiaki Aftodiikisi Rethimnis, and Kharikleia Giannoudi (C-379/07), Georgios Karampousanos (C-380/07), Sophocles Mikhopoulos v Dimos Geropotamou [2009]. In one case, the ruling was that the body introducing the case was not legally competent to do so, case C-363/11 Epitropos tou Elegktikou Sinedriou sto Ipourgio Politismou kai Tourismou v Ipourgio Politismou kai Tourismou – Ipiresia Dimosionomikou Elenchou [2012].

With regard to prevention of the abuse of fixed-term contracts, the CJEU adopts, in some cases, a rather restrictive position based on the argument of “objective” conditions, including where these are based on social policy considerations. In other cases, such as for economic purposes or in cases of gross abuse, the CJEU has a more expansive interpretation. Another notable finding is that more discretion is allowed to national courts to examine specific conditions in cases of abuse of fixed-term contracts, where the rulings provide little scope for interpretation by national judges. This may be due to the slim legal base in the abuse of fixed-term contracts, limited to the directive, and where the national level should ensure prevention of abuse of fixed-term contracts.

Conversion of fixed-term contracts to open-ended contracts: restrictive stance with high discretion to national judges de la Junta de Andalucía [2011], the issue was the differential treatment between fixed-term workers and CPWs in relation to the conversion of fixed-term contracts into open-ended ones, as provided for in the FTWD. In the Rosado Santana case, the issue was consideration of periods as a temporary civil servant for the purpose of obtaining internal promotion. In the Joined Cases C-302/11 to C-305/11 Rosanna Valenza (C-302/11 and C-304/11) Maria Laura Altavista (C-303/11), Laura Marsella, Simonetta Schettini, Sabrina Tomassini (C-305/11) v Autorità Garante della Concorrenza e del Mercato [2012], the issue was pay differences for civil servants who had just obtained open-ended contracts after periods as civil servants on fixed-term contracts. The CJEU ruled that in the absence of objective reasons, there could be no differing treatment between career and temporary civil servants on this issue. In this case, the CJEU left full (fact-finding) scope to the national judges to examine whether or not there actually existed differences in tasks between temporary and permanent career civil servants.

In Case C-177/10 Francisco Javier Rosado Santana v Consejería de Justicia y Administración Pública

Hence, in relation to the conversion of a fixed-term to an open-ended contract, the CJEU adopts a restrictive interpretation, with an important role in fact-finding for national judges. In the Spanish case, such judicialisation of the labour market is problematic, since it is based not on common principles but on differing standards. In general, however, the national courts have sought to protect individuals against unfair dismissal, typically by increasing the severance pay. However, the work of judges in Spain does not rest on uniform norms in this area, which is one of the reasons why the 2012 labour reform in Spain reduced the autonomy of labour courts in deciding on cases of dismissal (Gomez Abeillera 2012).

In Case C-251/11 Martial Huet v Université de Bretagne occidentale, [2012], we see once again that the issue of conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts is interpreted rather restrictively by the CJEU. In this case, the plaintiff's contract was changed from a fixed-term to an open-ended contract. However, the job description had been changed and the starting salary was lower. Here, the CJEU ruled that there was no obligation for employers to convert fixed-term contracts into open-ended ones with identical conditions. This ruling places on national courts the responsibility for analysing concrete conditions and assessing whether or not there existed abuse of recourse to fixed-term contracts.

In other cases concerning the conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts, there had not yet been successive contracts and the claim was thus ruled invalid by the CJEU (Mangold, Vasallo, Marrosu and Angelidaki and others). Overall, with regard to the conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts, the interpretation of the CJEU is restrictive.

Conclusion

The EU has the potential, via directives, to Europeanise the regulation of fixed-term employment in Member States. Yet, fixed-term work is at the crossroads between employers' desire for labour market flexibility and workers' need for job security. Thus, the goal of "re-regulation" of labour law (Countouris 2007) may clash with attempts to increase labour supply. Hence, the resulting FTWD, based on a framework agreement between social partners, is indeed an "incomplete contract" characterised by numerous ambiguous clauses and exceptions, which the CJEU has the jurisdiction to interpret if and when national judges find it to be unclear. The unusually high number of preliminary rulings in relation to the FTWD indicates that a good deal of doubt prevails concerning the interpretation of its provisions.

The analysis of the case law on the FTWD has allowed us to identify the principles the CJEU strongly upholds in areas that are characterised by tensions between labour market deregulation and worker protection. Our findings show that where the CJEU has a strong legal base, the rulings are clear and aim to improve protection and conditions for fixed-term workers. By contrast, in the areas of fixed-term work that are contentious, if they touch upon national politics of increasing labour supply, the CJEU tends to rule restrictively. In some areas, the rulings of the CJEU are rather ambiguous and thus represent legal zones of uncertainty.

More precisely, our analysis shows that the CJEU uses the FTWD as an entry point to address questions concerning the (equal) treatment of workers. The CJEU has an expansive interpretation of equal treatment which is in line with the strong EU jurisdiction on equality and anti-discrimination. A side effect of the improvement of conditions for fixed-term workers is that workers on open-ended contracts have sometimes seen the removal of their special privileges. However, in case of age discrimination, the CJEU bases its judgement on a broader understanding of social policy purposes, in line with Member States' priorities of increasing labour supply. Thus, while judgements in this area do uphold the need for the use of fixed-term contracts for older workers to be subject to certain conditions, the CJEU does not regard this practice as illegal – a rather surprising finding, given the strong stance on anti-discrimination and age discrimination in Community law (see Hartlapp 2012).

Similarly, with regard to conversion of fixed-term to open-ended contracts, the CJEU adopts a restrictive stance. With regard to abuse of fixed-term contracts, our findings suggest that in most instances the CJEU rules restrictively, although the Court rules against cases of gross abuse. Still, this area represents a zone of legal uncertainty, with some cases allowing for fixed-term contracts (for example, for social policy purposes) and others prohibiting the use of fixed-term contracts (for example, for economic reasons).

In sum, the CJEU is expansionist in its interpretation of equality in relation to the actual terms of the employment contract, relying on its strong legal base in this area. However, the CJEU does not uphold strong principles to decry the use or abuse of fixed-term contracts. Therefore, the CJEU sticks closely to the terms of its delegated authority: to interpret the meaning of EU law. The CJEU does not put a brake on the use of fixed-term contracts as a means of increasing labour supply; however, it does insist on equal treatment of workers, regardless of their contractual arrangements.

References

- Alter, K. (2001) Establishing the Supremacy of European Law: The Making of an International Rule of Law in Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bell, M. (2011) "The principle of non-discrimination within the Fixed-Term Work Directive". In Marie-Ange Moreau (ed.). Before and After the Economic Crisis: What Implications for the European Social Model? Edward Elgar.
- Bell, M. (2012) Between Flexicurity and Fundamental Social Rights: The EU Directives on Atypical Work, European Law Review 37(1): 31–48.
- Bermeo, N. and Pontusson, J. (2012) Coping with Crisis: Government Reactions to the Great Recession. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.
- Blauberger, M. (2012) With Luxembourg in mind ... the remaking of national policies in the face of ECJ jurisprudence. Journal of European Public Policy 19(1): 109–126.
- Börzel, T. and Risse, T. (2000) When Europe Hits Home: Europeanization and Domestic Change. European Integration online papers 4(15).
- Clauwaert, S. (1999) "The ETUC Point of View". In C. Vigneau, K. Ahlberg, Brian Bercusson and Niklas Bruun (eds.). Fixed term work in the EU – A European Agreement against Discrimination and Abuse. Stockholm: National Institute for Working Life.
- Conant, L. (2002) Justice Contained: Law and Politics in the European Union. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Countouris, N. (2007) The Changing Law of the Employment Relationship: Comparative Analyses in the European Context. Hampshire: Ashgate.
- Datta Gupta, N., Smith, N. and Verner, M. (2008) The impact of Nordic countries' family friendly policies on employment, wages, and children. Review of Economics of the Household 6(1): 65–89.
- Davies, A. (2012a) EU Labour Law, Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
- Davies, G. (2012b) Activism relocated: The self-restraint of the European Court of Justice in its national context. Journal of European Public Policy 19(1): 76–91.
- De la Porte, C. and Jacobsson, K. (2012) "Social Investment or Re-commodification? Assessing the Employment Policies of the EU Member States". In Nathalie Morel, Bruno Palier and Joakim Palme (eds.) Towards a Social Investment Welfare State? Ideas, Policies and Challenges. Bristol: Policy Press, pp. 117–152.
- Eichorst, W. (2014) Fixed-Term Contracts: Are Fixed-Term Contracts a Stepping Stone to a Permanent Job or a Dead End? IZA World of Labor 2014(45): 1–10.
- Eichorst, W. and Marx, P. (2012) "Whatever Works: Dualization and the Service Economy in Bismarckian Welfare States." In Patrick Emmenegger, Silja Häusermann, Bruno Palier and

- Martin Seeleib-Kaiser (eds.). The Age of Dualization: The Changing Face of Inequality in Deindustrializing Societies. New York: Oxford University Press, pp. 73–99.
- Emmenegger, P., Häusermann, S., Palier, B. and Seeleib-Kaiser, M. (2012) The Age of Dualization: The Changing Face of Inequality in Deindustrializing Societies. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Emmenegger, P. (2014) The Power to Dismiss: Trade Unions and the Regulation of Job Security in Western Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Esping-Andersen, G. (2009) The Incomplete Revolution: Adapting to Women's New Roles. Bristol: Polity.
- Falkner, G., Treib, O., Hartlapp, M. and Leiber, S. (2005) Complying with Europe: EU Harmonisation and Soft Law in Member States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Falkner, G. and Treib, O. (2008) Three Worlds of Compliance or Four? The EU15 Compared to New Member States. Journal of Common Market Studies 46(2): 293–313.
- Farnsworth, K and M. Irving, Z. (2011) Social Policy in Challenging Times: Economic Crisis and Welfare Systems. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Ghailani, D. (2013) "Vicissitudes of the social case law of the Court of Justice in times of recession". In Bart Vanhercke and David Natali (eds.). Social Developments in the European Union 2012. Brussels: OSE and ETUI.
- Gomez, A. F. J. (2012) The Spanish Labour Reform and the Courts: Employment Adjustment and the Search for Legal Certainty. Spanish Labour Law and Employment Relations Journal 1(1-2): 31–46.
- Hartlapp, M. (2012) Deconstructing EU old age policy: Assessing the potential of soft OMCs and hard EU law. European Integration Online Papers 16(3).
- Hepple, B. and Veneziani, B. (2009) The Transformation of Labour Law in Europe: A Comparative Study of 15 Countries, 1945-2004. Oxford: Hart Publishing.
- Howard, E. (2011) EU Equality Law: Three Recent Developments. European Law Journal 17(6): 785–803.
- King, D. and Rueda, D. (2008) Cheap Labor: The New Politics of 'Bread and Roses' in Industrialized Democracies. Perspectives on Politics 6(2): 279–297.
- Kroos, D. and Gottschall, K. (2012) "Dualization and Gender in Social Services: The Role of the State in Germany and France." In Patrick Emmenegger, Silja Häusermann, Bruno Palier and Martin Seeleib-Kaiser (eds.). The Age of Dualization: The Changing Face of Inequality in Deindustrializing Societies. New York: Oxford University Press, pp. 100–123.
- Leibfried, S. (2010) "Social Policy: Left to Judges and the Markets?" In Helen Wallace, Mark A. Pollack and Alasdair Young (eds.). Policy-Making in the European Union. Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 253–282.

- Martinsen, D. (2015) An Ever More Powerful Court? The Political Constraints of Legal Integration in the European Union. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mastenbroek, E. and Kaeding, M. (2006) Europeanization Beyond the Goodness of Fit: Domestic Politics in the Forefront. Comparative European Politics 4(4): 331–354.
- Mazey, S. (2012) “Policy Entrepreneurship, Group Mobilization, and the Creation of a New Policy Domain: Women’s Rights and the European Union”. In J. Richardson (ed.). Constructing a Policy-Making State? Policy Dynamics in the EU. Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 123–144.
- Mercader, U. J. R. (2012) Care Crosses the River: the 2012 Spanish Labour Reform, Spanish Labour Law and Employment Relations Journal 1(1-2): 14–21.
- OJEC (1997) Council Directive 97/81/EC of 15 December 1997 concerning the Framework Agreement on part-time work concluded by UNICE, CEEP and the ETUC.
- OJEC (1999) Council Directive 1999/70/EC of 28 June 1999 concerning the framework agreement on fixed-term work concluded by ETUC, UNICE and CEEP.
- OJEC (2008) Directive 2008/104/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 19 November 2008 on temporary agency work.
- Palier, B. and Thelen, K. (2010) Institutionalizing Dualism: Complementarities and Change in France and Germany. Politics and Society 38(1): 119–148.
- Panke, D. (2007) The European Court of Justice as an agent of Europeanization? Restoring compliance with EU law. Journal of European Public Policy 14(6): 847–866.
- Pollack, M. A. (2003) The Engines of European Integration: Delegation, Agency, and the Agenda-Setting in the EU. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Radaelli, C. (2000) Whither Europeanization? Concept stretching and substantive change European Integration online Papers 4(8).
- Scharpf, F. W. (2010) The Asymmetry of European Integration, or Why the EU Cannot Be a 'Social Market Economy'. Socio-Economic Review 8(2): 211–50.
- Schmidt, M. (2005) The Principle of Non-discrimination in Respect of Age: Dimensions of the ECJ’s Mangold Judgment. German Law Journal 7(5): 505–524.
- Schömann, I. (2014) Labour Law Reforms in Europe: Adjusting Employment Protection Legislation for the Worse? ETUI Working Paper 2104(2).
- Stettes, O. (2005) ECJ limits fixed-term employment for older workers. EIRONLINE URL: www.eurofound.europa.eu/eiro/2005/12/feature/de0512104f.htm (accessed on March 11, 2013).
- Stone Sweet, A. (2010) The European Court of Justice and the Judicialization of EU Governance. Living Reviews in European Governance 5(2).
- Stone Sweet, A. and Stranz, K. (2012) Rights adjudication and constitutional pluralism in Germany and

- Europe. Journal of European Public Policy 19(1): 92–108.
- Treib, O. (2014) Implementing and complying with EU governance outputs. Living Reviews in European Governance 9(1).
- Venn, D. (2009) Legislation, Collective Bargaining and Enforcement: Updating the OECD Employment Protection Indicators. OECD Social, Employment and Migration Working Papers No. 89.
- Wasserfallen, F. (2010) The judiciary as legislator? How the European Court of Justice shapes policy-making in the European Union. Journal of European Public Policy 17(8): 1128–1146.

Figure 1: Framework for analysing the Europeanisation of EU law

Europeanisation dimensions	Degree of Europeanisation
	←		→
Scope of EU Directive	Restrictive	Neutral	Expansive
Interpretation of EU law in preliminary questions to ECJ	Restrictive	Neutral	Expansive
Degree of discretion to national judges (proportionality)	High	Implicit	Low
Outcome
Degree of Europeanisation	Low level (contained justice)	Medium level (neutral justice)	High level (expansive justice)

Table 1: Key aspects of the Fixed-Term Work Directive (OJEC 1999)

Aim Clause 1	The directive aims to ‘improve the quality of fixed-term work by ensuring the application of the principle of non-discrimination’ and to ‘establish a framework to prevent abuse arising from the use of successive fixed-term contracts or relationships’.
Scope Clause 2	It applies to all fixed-term workers who have an employment relationship as defined in law, collective agreements or practice in each Member State (except initial vocational training relationships and apprenticeship schemes as well as employment contracts that have been concluded within the framework of a specific public or publicly-supported training, integration or vocational re-training programmes).
Purpose of contract/objective conditions Clause 3	Fixed-term work is defined as ‘having an employment contract or relationship entered into directly between an employer and a worker where the end of the employment contract or relationship is determined by objective conditions such as reaching a specific date, completing a specific task, or the occurrence of a specific event’. Comparable permanent workers (CPW) are workers ‘with an employment contract or relationship of indefinite duration, in the same establishment, engaged in the same or similar work/occupation, due regard being given to qualification/skills [...] Where there is no comparable permanent worker in the same establishment, the comparison shall be made by reference to the applicable collective agreement, in accordance with national law, collective agreements of practice’.
Equal treatment/non-discrimination Clause 4	The principle of equal treatment stipulates that ‘fixed-term workers shall not be treated in a less favourable manner than comparable permanent workers solely because they have a fixed-term contract or relation unless difference is justified on objective grounds ’ (4.1). The directive also stipulates that ‘where appropriate the principle of pro-rata temporis shall apply’ (4.2). There is some discretion in how the principle is applied, since the application of the equal treatment clause is to be decided by Member States after consultation with the social partners (4.3). Period-of service qualifications relating to particular conditions of employment shall be the same for fixed-term workers as for permanent workers except where different length-of service qualifications are justified on objective grounds (4.4).
Prevention of abuse Clause 5	Requirement for Member States to devise measures to prevent abuse of recourse to fixed-term contracts. The clause specifies that Member States should counter successive use of fixed-term contracts, where such measures do not already exist, by specifying at least one among three measures: (1) objective reasons for justifying renewal of a particular contract or relationship; (2) a maximum total duration of fixed-term contracts; or (3) a maximum number of renewals of fixed-term contracts. The clause further specifies that Member States shall determine the conditions under which employment contracts can be regarded as successive and the conditions under which such contracts shall be considered as contracts of indefinite duration.
Information Clauses 6 & 7	These clauses require establishments to provide information about and access to job vacancies and training opportunities to fixed-term workers on an equal footing with CPW as well as about fixed-term work to existing workers’ representative bodies.

Table A1: Overview of ECJ case law on fixed-term work

Country	Name of case, year	Issues	Public/ Private	Position government	Outcome	Discretion national court
Spain	Gaviero & Torres 2010	Is the Spanish state required to implement principle of access to "special benefit"? Is it required to do so retroactively? Clause 4	Public	The LEBEP (Law for civil servants) should be regarded as a national measure transposing Directive 1999/70, even though there is no reference to Directive 1999/70.	Interim civil servants can rely on directive against State before a national court to obtain recognition of their entitlement to length-of-service increments; when period of transposition of the directive is terminated, the principle must be considered retroactively
Spain	Del Cerro Alonso 2007	Does the directive on FTC cover financial conditions (other than pay)? Access to special benefit (even when not a full civil servant). C 4	Public	Employment conditions do not include extra financial bonus	FTC workers should not be discriminated against with regard to bonus; "employment conditions" must be interpreted as meaning that it can act as basis for a claim of extra bonus
Spain	Rosado Santana 2010	Consideration taken of periods of service as interim (fixed-term) civil servant in the view of seeking to attain an internal promotion. C 4&6	Public	Directive not applicable to this case; there exist differences between career and interim civil servants with regard to requirements of entry, merits and capacities; some tasks reserved ONLY for career civil servants	Periods of service previously completed as interim civil servant must be taken into consideration; the directive precludes difference in treatment between career civil servants and interim civil servants based solely on the basis of contractual difference for purposes of promotion, unless there are objective reasons.	X
Germany	Mangold 2005	Age discrimination allowing for using FTC; abuse of (successive) FTC; is national law precluded from use of fixed term contracts only on basis of age (52 +)? C 4&5	Private	Lowering of age to 52 for fixed-term work was to offset new social guarantees; it is intended to encourage employment of older persons in Germany	Difference in treatment exclusively on the basis of age via fixed term contracts is NOT allowed; national legislation decreasing age for fixed term contracts is allowed due to the aim to encourage employment	X

Germany	Kumpan 2011	Does EU law preclude national legislation that allows for fixed term contracts solely on basis of age and no other objective conditions? Should national law include provisions to prevent successive use of FTC? Is national collective agreement in conflict with EU law? C 5	Private	N/A	Discrimination should not be allowed when the initial employment relationship continued for the same activity, with the same employer; collective agreement not in line with EU law.
Germany	Kucuk 2012	Can objective need for replacement be considered permanent due to multiple replacement needs that reoccur? Is f-t employment relationship with replacement justified when associated with social policy purpose (support maternity/paternity), even if recurring? C 4&5	Public	Employers should have the discretion to assess need for fixed term contracts, even if recurring. It is different from a "fixed and permanent" need. Also, it is in line with social policy objective	Temporary replacements on recurring or even PERMANENT basis do not mean there is no objective reason for agreeing that contract. However, the number and cumulative duration of the fixed-term contracts with same employer must be taken into consideration	X
Italy	Vassallo 2006	Do individuals have the right to indemnity for loss caused by failure to adopt appropriate measures to prevent abuse relating to the use of FTC and/or relationships with employers in public sector? Under which conditions can FTC be considered to be converted to contract of indefinite duration? C 4	Public	Questions inadmissible	FTC directive does not preclude national legislation which does not ensure conversion of two successive fixed-term contracts to contract of indefinite duration, if another measure prevents and punishes abuse of FTC by public sector employer.	X

Italy	Marrosu and Sardino 2006	Do individuals have the right to indemnity for loss caused by failure to adopt appropriate measures to prevent abuse relating to the use of f-t contracts and/or relationships with employers in public sector? Under which conditions can f-t contract be considered to be converted to contract of indefinite duration? C 4	Public	Questions inadmissible	FTC directive does not preclude national legislation which does not ensure conversion of two successive fixed-term contracts to contract of indefinite duration, if another measure prevents and punishes abuse of f-t contracts by public sector employer.	X
Italy	Valenza and others 2012	Does loss of length of service under FTC as provided in national legislation fall within scope of derogation on the basis of objective grounds? Can length of service accrued under FTC be taken account of? C 4	Public	Recruitment under "stabilisation procedure" is a derogation from normal procedure based on competition; this justifies starting pay level from the beginning of stabilisation and not the start of the f-t contract; there should not be reverse discrimination against career civil servants. Account being taken of length of service accrued in FTC is contrary to Italian legislation	Clause 4 of framework agreement precludes national legislation which prohibits rules that unconditionally justify difference in treatment with respect to public officials on a fixed-term basis	X
Italy	Sibilio 2013	Is the directive applicable to "travailleurs socialment utiles"; does clause 4 preclude that these workers receive less remuneration than workers on contract of indefinite duration for same task?	Public	Framework agreement does not cover these workers	The directive does not cover this type of worker (it is a type of contract excluded by the directive according to clause 2 of the directive)

Austria	Zentralbetriebsrat der Landeskrankenhäuser Tirols 2010	Discrimination: access to benefits and leaves restricted for employees employed for less than six months. C 4	Public	National legislation not concerned by EU law (province of Tyrol)	Clause 4 of FTD precludes national legislation which excludes from the scope of law workers employed under fixed-term contracts of a maximum of six months or on a causal basis (no discretion)
Greece	Adeneler and others 2006	Failure to renew fixed-term contracts, lack of objective reasons for fixing the duration, during transposition of directive into Greek law. C 5	Public (but governed by private law)	Public sector workers are covered by different presidential decree; hence questions concerning presidential decree for private sector workers are irrelevant. According to the relevant presidential decree, nine of the concerned 18 workers should get indefinite contracts	Objective reasons justifying successive fixed-term contracts require recourse to the particular type of employment relationship, 20 working days between two fixed-term contracts are not sufficient to claim that two contracts are not successive, domestic courts need to anticipate directive if directive is implemented belatedly, no special exception rules for public sector (no discretion)
Greece	Angelidaki and others 2009	Failure to renew fixed-term contract (first renewal), lack of objective reason for fixing the duration. C 5	Public (but governed by private law)	Reference to an old (1920) law to justify complaints are misguided because law does not apply to public sector workers	Objective reasons justifying fixation of duration necessary, but does not apply to first and single use of a fixed-term employment relationship
Greece	Epitropos tou Elegktikou Synedriou 2012	Refusal to approve the payment order relating to the remuneration of an (f-t) employee at the concerned ministry, ministry argues that employee had been on leave for 34 days during the 7 month period and the remuneration should be reduced in proportion to the length of that leave (for FTC,	Public (but governed by private law)		The dispute resolving body does not constitute a court or tribunal and consequently is not entitled to send a reference for a preliminary ruling to the court. No decision. First, the parties would have to approach a "real" national court.

		leaves are unpaid, unlike CPW). C4
Bulgaria	Georgiev 2010	Is it allowed to have national legislation that allows for ONLY fixed term contracts for university lecturers having reached the age of 65 (until 68 MAX)? Age discrimination. C 4	Public	Such national legislation is not unfavourable to the professors because it makes it possible for them to continue working after reaching the age of 65, when they can be made to retire with pension. These professors have an opportunity to work after 65 via fixed term contracts but until 68. The government argues that in this way, national legislation pursues a social policy aim	Directive 2000/78 does not preclude national legislation that allows university professors to continue working after the normal age of retirement as this allows for flexibility for the individual and the university, and should allow for recruitment of younger university staff. It is for national court to determine whether this policy is actually implemented by universities
Ireland	Impact 2008	Pay and pension conditions for civil servants on fixed-term contracts: claim for equality of treatment with comparable permanent worker; are there conditions for renewal of fixed term contracts by government departments for up to 8 years? C 4&5	Public	The fact that there is no definition of "employment conditions" makes that provision impossible for national courts to apply;	Clause 4 on equal working conditions with comparable permanent worker is sufficiently precise for workers to be able to invoke it (and to obtain equal treatment); Contrary to Commission claim, Court maintains that there must be objective reasons to justify the renewal of fixed- term contracts (clause 5)
France	Huet 2012	Conversion FTC to contract of indefinite duration; is there obligation to renew contract in identical terms with the principal clauses of the previous contract, esp. Concerning job title and remuneration	Public	Conversion of material conditions of f-t contract to regular contract may be detrimental to the individual	No obligation to convert exact terms of FTC to terms of contract of indefinite duration; BUT Member State must ensure that the conversion of fixed term employment contracts to contracts of indefinite duration is not unfavourable to the person concerned when the tasks and nature of functions remain unchanged	X

Source: own compilation on the basis of search in CJEU database